The prevalent dominance of men over women in society has sparked heavy debate among sociologists around the world. Hegemonic masculinity, a phrase popularized by Australian sociologist R.W. Connell, seeks to explain this phenomenon. Hegemonic masculinity is the concept of an ideal form of masculinity characterized by the domination of men who exhibit these "ideal" qualities over females and other males in the gender hierarchy, and is constructed in relation to Abstract. Masculinity, an expression of sexual identity, is typically considered the enactment of male identity. The current analysis is a deductive summative content analysis of three popular “guy movies” using the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory (CMNI). Results indicated that Emotional Control, Risk-Taking, Violence, and Dominance were the most frequently represented CMNI factors.

Hypermasculinity is a psychological term for the exaggeration of male stereotypical behavior, such as an emphasis on physical strength, aggression, and sexuality. This term has been used ever since the research conducted by Donald L. Mosher and Mark Sirkin in 1984. Mosher and Sirkin operationally define hypermasculinity or the "macho personality" as consisting of three variables:
